She Speaks

for Mezzo-Soprano and Piano poem by Hilda Raz

PROGRAM NOTE

In setting Hilda Raz's wonderful poem She Speaks, I have tried to find musical analogues for the contrasting views of the Garden and the world voiced in the poem. Where Adam is blunt and iron-clad, the narrator (and perhaps the poet) see things in a more variegated light. The allusion at the end of the last stanza, which Adam would surely cast as another monosyllable, is taken up instead by the piano in a brief coda.

I sit in this summer house and, Adam, I think of you and your preposterous naming and talking, your making the world new each day — how exhausting — and the tall banyans you drew up out of the ground to show me; each day the tangerine rose-hips, the azure of an ocean you called blue, meaning one color, and which to my eye was variegated, a word you had no use for;
parrots and sparrows you feathered in one direction not accounting for the variable air currents; the rugosa and its blatant fruit, so provocative, so showy.

Outside the cottage now you are no longer here, a pale basswood flourishes in all this salty weather and numerous foliages evolve nameless in the fresh water rain. Animals whose plush fur matts away the damp howl for attention, beg to be let into any shelter but this one, Adam,
a house of women with no names, only a companionable silence that admits no visitors; only later, perhaps, an orange presence in a circle of stones, now like the sun, now the moon, now flickering, now pausing, now going soundlessly up.
